LOST HIS LIFE SAVING HAT.

Charles E. Dill Leaned Out of Window to Catch Headgear and Struck the Side of a Bridge.

Trying to save his hat when the wind wrenched it from his head, Charles E. Dill of Decatur, Ill., lost his life yesterday. Dill was formerly agent for the Wabash at Ivesdale, but decided to go on the road, and was "broken in" on the Edwardsville branch.

He was passing through Edwardsville on a through freight bound for East St. Louis when a gust of wind blew his hat off. Dill leaned out of the engine, where he had been riding, and nis head struck against the sides of a stacl bridge over Cahokia Creek. He was knocked under the wheels and ground to deata.

An inquest was held yesterday afternoon by Deputy Coroner C. E. Hoskins of Edwardsville.

A piece of work of vital interest to the Tri-Citles and of East St. Louis, as well as the farmers living in the bottom, is under way. At the instance of bottom farmers the engineering firm of Sheppard & Morgan of Edwardsville are running lines and making estimates for a short cut for Cahokia Creek to the Mississippi. They have finished the preliminary survey and find that a straight channel could be dux. starting a short distance below Edwardsville, which would necessitate a cut of only three miles to the river. This channel would be from eleven to twenty-two feet in depth, and would relieve the overflow which comes half a dozen or more times a year by taking the water rapidly and by direct route to the river. water rapidly and by direct route to the river.

As it is, Cahokia twists in and out through the bottom to East St. Louis, winds around the Relay Station and finally reaches the river some distance below the Eads bridge. Its course is a great detriment to business, besides taking upvery valuable ground which could be otherwise utilized in many ways. At the same time the crooked course retards the current and causes the water to back up on slight occasion.

The engineers will prepare estimates of the probable cost and report soon.
